The Cholera in 1873.

Thirty-eight years ago yesterday Paris experienced the greatest excitement ever known in the city. It was county court day. There was a large crowd in town, and the next day the Bourbon Fair was to begin. About noon a daughter of Neddie Connor developed a case of cholera and when the word was passed around, the people became panic-stricken, and everybody started for home. Men in their excitement got into the wrong buggies and it took many days to get the horses and buggies returned to their rightful owners. Miss Connor died at 4 o'clock that afternoon and was buried at 5:30. The fair was postponed until October, and the first day there was snow, accompanied by extremely disagreeable weather. This was the only case of cholera in Paris, but there were several deaths in Millersburg, where Miss Connor was supposed to have contracted the disease.
